The Postwagen is the only historical wooden structure in the imperial city, because the construction of wooden houses was banned after the devastating fire in 1656.

The Postwagen owes its present name to the citizens of Aachen, who saw a resemblance in the structural appearance to a post wagon.

Prior to this, since the 18th century, it was the book seller Freyaldenhoven who gave this building, which stood in the shadow of the Granus Tower, its name. Tradition has it that Freyaldenhoven picked the nickname "Uellespejfel" because although he was a bookseller, he could not read and "read" the wildest stories to his customers from books that sounded completely different when read the next time. He calculated the books according to weight. His fantasy and ability to entertain people with made-up stories and jokes, enjoyed great popularity.

The days of book selling were over and Georg Buchmeier open the Postwagen in September 1902 as a cosy restaurant for residents, students, artists and visitors to the city. It became the historic meeting place in Aachen – a restaurant filled with cheery drinks and convivial company.
